

San Francisco Residential Real Estate Market

Market Intelligence Report
January 2024 to March 2026

Market Overview

San Francisco homes sold for a median of $1.2M during this period. Prices ranged from $965K in December 2024 to $1.375M in March 2026. Days on market fluctuated significantly. Early 2024 saw longer timelines at 62.6 days, but the market improved to the mid 20s within months.

Pricing Trends

San Francisco sellers benefited from above list price sales. Homes sold 4 percent over asking price on average, with a sale to list ratio of 104.27 percent. This indicates consistent buyer competition. Peak ratios reached 113.8 percent in March 2026 and 111.3 percent in June 2025. Condominiums and single family residences led price per square foot at roughly $900 per sqft, followed by lofts and townhouses.

Market Activity

New listings peaked during spring and fall, following typical real estate seasonality. Closed sales declined sharply from mid 2025 onward. Transaction volume dropped from 45 to 53 closings monthly early in the period to only 16 to 30 by early 2026. This gap between available inventory and buyer transactions suggests either softening demand or longer buyer decision timelines.

Competitive Landscape

KW Advisors dominates San Francisco with roughly $14M in sales volume, followed by Compass at $5.5M. KW Advisors also leads in units sold with 9 transactions. The market concentrates among a small number of brokerages given the 845 total homes sold across the entire analysis period.

Key Takeaways

- Homes in San Francisco consistently sell above list price, averaging 104 percent. This signals a strong seller's market where demand continues to outpace supply.
- Median prices remained resilient around $1.2M even as mortgage rates declined from 7.1 percent to 6.1 percent. Lower rates did not trigger the expected price surge, suggesting market saturation.
- Transaction volume dropped significantly in 2025 and 2026, with closed sales hitting historic lows in January 2026. You're seeing fewer deals close even though inventory remains available.
- Spring seasonality remains strong. New listings and closings both peak in April and May each year. Plan your market timing around these patterns.
- KW Advisors is the dominant brokerage in San Francisco by both volume and units, with Compass as the distant second choice. Market concentration among these two firms is notable.
